

SAFEWAY FRUIT FLAVOURED SODA

Properties list:

- new product
- soft drinks
- can and tin
- metals
- contemporary
- identity by pictograms
- identity by system of colour
- range of products
- end-user packaging
- information about content

Anthem created a strategic point of difference on shelf for their private-label fruit sodas. Drawing from a more progressive European design influence, Anthem's new system removes all the extra layers and boils each flavor down to its essence—it says only what it is and doesn't claim to be anything else. Each can's artwork is iconic and accentuates the specific characteristics that consumers associate most with each fruit. In addition to framing the artwork, the parentheses give focus to the simple flavor and subtly insert a succinct explanation of the can's contents. The product's form factor was carefully considered in the packaging development as well. By keeping the design simple, the usual color limitations were avoided; crisp, recognizable imagery was the result. Like their contents, the cans are refreshing, and their unified, consistent look offers an eye-catching presence in the soda aisle."

Reference: http://designarchives.aiga.org/entry.cfm/eid_8879

Credits:

Country: California

Year: 2006

Creative director: Ron Vandenberg

Art director: Brian Lovell

Designer/illustrator: Michael D. Johnson

Production director: Chris Toner

Production artist: Mary Mazonson

Project manager: Catherine Rude

Client: Safeway Inc.

Other images:

